PRODUCTS UL LISTED WITH SOCKETS

Macromatic Plug-in Products Now UL Listed with Sockets

We are often asked, "why our product is UL Component Recognized instead of UL Listed"? The answer comes from www.ul.com: "UL's Component Recognition Service covers the testing and evaluation of component products that are incomplete or restricted in performance capabilities". Since any plug-in product can be used with almost any manufacturer's socket, UL has no information or control over the type of field-installed wires or terminations used with plug-in products such as time delay relays, three-phase monitor relays or control relays. Therefore, they classify the product as Recognized instead of Listed.

However, UL does allow the UL Listed Mark to be used on UL Component Recognized plug-in products if the manufacturer specifies a particular UL Component Recognized socket to be used and if the combination is submitted to UL for Listing. Macromatic has completed such a program at UL, and now all of our plug-in relays carry the UL Listed logo in addition to the UL Component Recognition logo.

As you can see from the photo, the particular Macromatic 8 or 11 pin socket is specified on the product nameplate. This indicates that UL has Listed the combination of the Macromatic plug-in product and the appropriate Macromatic socket when used together. Also notice that the UL Component Recognition logo remains. This means that if the Macromatic plug-in product is used with any socket other than the appropriate Macromatic socket, the unit is only Component Recognized, not Listed.

Now panel shops and other equipment builders can eliminate questions & confusion on whether the products are truly UL Listed by specifying & using Macromatic plug-in products and sockets.
